

Bike lanes aren't meant for riders in spandex

From time to time, we hear of collisions involving cyclists — like the one on Tuesday night on Sexsmith Road.

You have these cyclists in their nice bright outfits, zooming down the road — you come to make a right hand turn, and all of a sudden they are right upon you.

Bike lanes were not built for cyclists traveling at high speeds, but more for leisurely commuter cyclists.

And these idiotic bike boys think they own the road — giving you the excuse they'll damage their rims if they go off into the gravel.

After all, roads were built for cars, and if there is no shoulder on the road, why should I have to be forced to make evasive manoeuvres to avoid them around blind corners or narrow roads?

Perhaps our city council should look at banning these racing bikes from our streets — there are lots of places these spandex-toting jackasses can ride outside of the city. They just have to load up their bikes into their vehicles and drive a little ways.
